public enum VoteType { Up, Down } public class UserVote { public int UserId { get; set; } public VoteType VoteType { get; set; } public int Score { get; set; } } I want to decouple the system so I don't need to expose VoteType to the outside world. I can't use an abstract or interface as that is too limited. I can't use a class for UserVote as that is against polymorphism. In the end I just want to get the following data from the class: { "UserId": 1, "VoteType": 1, "Score": 1 } I am wondering whether there is a class that does not expose VoteType that can encapsulate the voting system? A: A solid decoupled way to do it is to use some events. Basically, create a property called bool HasBeenRated => DateTime.Now > TimeOfMyLastVote; which your User object can raise at a convenient time. Now you can have an event called UpVote public event Action UpVote; that your various objects can subscribe to. And then you can create a class which implements that event public class User { public User(VoteType voteType) { _voteType = voteType; } public VoteType VoteType { get; set; } //... other props/methods public bool HasBeenRated => DateTime.Now > TimeOfMyLastVote; public void RaiseUpVote() { // some code _upVote?.Invoke(userId); d0c515b9f4
